Abstract (Article Summary)

Fanney Hunter and Brian Dougherty, mechanical engineers at the National Institute of Standards and Technology, have invented a photovoltaic residential hot water system. Unlike conventional solar thermal systems in which water or an antifreeze circulates through solar collectors, the new system converts sunlight to electricity, which is used to heat residential water. The NIST system uses a conventional electric water heater from which the standard upper and lower electric elements have been removed and replaced with 2 assemblies of 3 elements each. A microprocessor built into the system activates the appropriate combination of elements, forcing the photovoltaic cells to continuously operate at their optimum power point.

U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission

Search CPSC's entire web site (important: read the tips below)

Having problems?

- Search results may contain one or more of the words entered in the query box (Boolean "OR"; example: crib infant). Documents with the most matches to the query words are listed before documents with fewer matches. If a match must contain all words, use "AND" between the words (example: crib AND infant). To search for a phrase only, use quotation marks around the words (example: "infant crib").
- Searches will find documents themselves and may also find menu pages containing links to them. If you choose a menu page from your search results and wish to investigate it more, you can use the "find in page" feature of your browser to look for a search term. If you don't want menu pages in your search, they can be excluded by using a trick. For example, to find all documents with the word "halogen", put that word in the search box. To exclude menu pages with links to these documents, put the following in the search box: halogen -imagelink: banner.jpg - since just about all menu pages (including this page) have the banner graphic at the top, this will exclude them.
- There is a lot more you can do to tailor your search and there is also an advanced search capability.
